The story of "Philadelphia Jack" winni DBrien's battle with Stanley Ketchell, gave back in 1909, is a tale which shows only

"The conditions called for our meet-g at 165 pounds, which was com-ratively easy for me," related Brien. "I worked along easily, and PBrien. "I worked along easily, and a few days before the fight was as and as natid as natis and notched 166. And then I received notice from Willis Britt, manager of Ketchell, that I must make the seemingly impossible weight of 166. The original conditions had alled for 165, and Britt realized that, at my age, it was a terrible task for ne to shear below it and still retain the shear below it and still retain. and lose all the money that I had spent In training and cast aside the prospect of a nice purse or get rid of five pounds. So I decided to try for the 160-pound limit. I worked off three myself, but on the morning of the fight I was two pounds over. I then had two men, Ketchell's trainers as it happened, to help me get rid of the stants was to force me into a rubber suit, heavy woolen clothes and a
